Thou Shalt Not Love

— A NOVEL BY —

GEORGIA GRAIG

As their eyes met she had a premonition that she and this blonde representative of the aristocracy of old New York were fated to clash more than once. Thinly veiled antagonism clashed between them, almost a thing you could see, instead of merely feel, in its intensity. Starr sensed the trouble with Stephanie at once. The girl was jealous of Michael Fairbourne's attentions to "Play-Girl," and now that she had seen Starr, all Michael's protests that his interest was purely in his firm's behalf were under scrutiny by Stephanie, who was inclined to have thoughts of her own on the subject.

Starr's mocking smile deepened. Her supercilious nose was heightened. There was a hint of devilment in her voice as she answered:

"I am interested to meet you, too, Miss Dale. However, oh, well, I never remember to see Michael—has told me so much about you."

For a second naked venom burned in Stephanie's blue eyes, she flung at Michael in a brilliant voice:

"Better be careful to whom you speak of me, Mike, darling. I certainly don't want to be put between the covers of one of Starr Ellison's 'True confessions!'"

Starr caught her breath sharply, as though she had been slapped in the face. She closed her eyes, and on opening them, all at once she found herself alone. Stephanie had turned away unceremoniously. Someone had claimed Michael's attention for the moment. Starr looked around, bewildered.

A voice caught her ears. Stephanie's frosty voice. Deliberately loud, so that Starr could not help overhearing, Stephanie was saying to somebody:

"I think it's simply terrible that poor Mike be associated with creature of her type, even though it's merely in a business way. His firm is handling her book, you know, and they've insisted on his attending to her publicity. As if she needed any more! But Mike's so clever."

And of course he's expected to be nice to her on the firm's account, sort of act as a master of ceremonies, as it were. . . . But my dear, I perfectly galling when decent people have to pander to a common adventuress!"

CHAPTER VII.

Starr flushed to the very roots of her hair. So that was the story Michael had told Stephanie! Her red mouth set in a bitter straight line. She might have known. Though surely Michael owed a sized mortgagality than that to the girl who was helping him carry out his fantastic whim? No matter how little he knew of her—or cared to know. No matter what he imagined her previous life had been. He should have some little consideration for her. If his book made him rich enough to marry Stephanie Dale, she of the stuff-necked aristocracy, it would be partly because of the bribe played in his life by Starr Ellison.

Starr was jolted out of her temporary embarrassment by the moment of quick resentment, by a man's voice. At first she thought it was Michael. But the eyes looking down into hers were as black as her own instead of gray. The face was leaner, and the hair incredibly sleek, where Michael's black hair had an arresting wave.

The man smiling at her said: "I believe I'm the only man here who hasn't been introduced to you. I'm beginning to wonder if the other night isn't deliberate."

Starr recognized him. True, she had not met him, but she remembered Michael saying:

"See that chap over there—dark-complexioned chap with the Menjon look? That's Lance Marlowe. If my book had been 'Play-Boy' instead of 'Play-Girl,' Lance is the very type who would have picked. He's tailor-made for the part. He's been a play-boy

IN BED FOR WEEKS WITH BACKACHE

Quick Relief With Kruschen

It was advice from her mother that led this woman to take Kruschen Salts for her backache, and before she had finished the first bottle she was feeling better. This is the letter she wrote:

"About this time last year I had pains in my back and was prostrate for three weeks. I could not even rise in bed. I tried several well-known remedies, but to no avail. Then I wrote to my mother telling her of my trouble. She wrote to me by return of post urging me to try Kruschen Salts. I immediately bought a bottle and I can truthfully say before I had taken the fifth dose I could sit up. I kept on taking them and in less than two weeks I was on my feet again, and never without Kruschen now."—Mrs. A.G.

Unless the kidneys function properly, certain acid wastes, instead of being expelled, are allowed to pollute the blood, and produce many of our common ailments: backache, rheumatism, and excessive fatigue. Kruschen Salts is an excellent diuretic kidney aperient, valuable in assisting the kidneys to excrete acid impurities.

For twenty years—always will be, I guess.

"I don't suppose he ever found any good reason for being anything else, and it seems to have been wished on him. His father left him (to tell the truth) He has a yacht, a string of polo ponies, all that sort of stuff, but he can't say anything knows he has never had an honest day's work in his life. Or any other kind. His favorite indoor sport is buying diamonds for his current light of love and then he comes and go in quick procession. Also, and this is important in the eyes of a good many New Yorkers who still cling to such outmoded ideas as decency, as far as the honor and chastity of women are concerned he is probably the most dangerous man in New York!"

Starr felt a little tinge of excitement when the man whom Michael had so sketchily characterized spoke to her. It was a long moment before she answered his greeting. And then her reply was in keeping with the role she was playing.

She drawled, with a slow smile, as her long eyes lifted to him lazily:

"Perhaps Michael believes in saving the best for the last."

Lance suggested: "Or perhaps he is not unaware that a friendship unsentimentally begun is always all the more thrilling."

"Starr laughed, and Lance hurried on, his black eyes burning down at her: "Now that you have met me, I'm glad to have the opportunity for you to tell me all about yourself."

Starr's eyes dropped demurely, then she lifted them for the scant fraction of a second to say:

"There's nothing to tell about me—that everybody doesn't already know. I might begin at the beginning, though, and tell you my age, weight, and twenty-one, and—"

"Adorable!" whispered Lance, his eyes husky. "Will you dance with me?"

Starr held up her arms and they glided into a dance. He was pleasant to dance with, lithe and graceful, and though she had never seen him wait in the haunting throb of a rumba, with the waves of the Spanish music holding in its depths the cadence of the emotional pleading of love in a setting of moonlit balconies and patios inside royal walls, she-eyed amoritas with mantillas.

Starr steps fitted perfectly into Lance's skilled footwork. Her own perfection was the result of Michael's teaching.

Lance's sleek black head bent closely over hers.

"How has such a girl as you ever managed so long to remain innocent?" If you've been anywhere I've been, you've certainly been hiding behind dark glasses."

"Sometimes I wear a long gray beard," Starr murmured.

"And now?"

"Oh, the usual answer," Starr whispered lightly. "It was shown to me plainly how greatly it would be to my advantage to take off my mask."

Michael dear man. My appetite for kachishik is insatiable, I assure you."

Lance laughed softly. "Money!"

What a conversation for such a glorious dance! And here I am trying to think of enough words to try to tell you how gorgeous you are, you, with your Cleopatra eyes, and—"

and—his head bent lower as he whispered—"your adorable red lips that nobody knows better than I am were made for a hundred kisses. . . ."

Starr drew back from him a little and looked up into his eyes. Her whisper seemed choked.

"Only a hundred?" she asked.

"And I had thought."

"Just the appetizer, my dear," Lance laughed. "There would be a full menu ahead."

Starr studied the man as they danced. His face was not unpleasant. He had a full, rather sensuous mouth, and the bright, roving eyes of a real, less pleasure seeker. At such close range she could not see the tiny lines of disquiet marring his well-shaped features, yet even so he looked younger than his years.

She wondered how she was doing with her verbal fencing with him. Was she saying what might be expected of her? The most dangerous man in New York. Well, it was an apt meeting. Did she not hear the reputation of being the most dangerous woman? Play-Boy and—Play-Girl!

They talked a great deal as they danced, and it was a relief to bandy light chatter with someone who skimmed over the surface of life. The tilt with Stephanie: the long hours during which she was being coached for her part by Michael, the near, dizzy attraction of Michael—al had combined to stir emotions deeper than Starr Ellison had any right to feel. She must not let herself feel too deeply about anything. Her time was too short, and feelings could be so painful.

Lance Marlowe was exactly the right antidote for her. He was incapable of feeling deep. Of that Starr was instinctively certain. He was not just let himself feel too much for him was not what it was to world. It was his playground. That was the way it must be for her. It had all been settled. For Starr Ellison the world must be her playground for her brief six months!

It came to Starr at once that Lance Marlowe was one man who could show her how to crowd a lifetime of thrills and excitement into his current single day, if she would let him.

He was saying, as they swept down the long glittering floor of the ballroom:

"I still can't see, all joking aside, why you've remained anonymous so long. Were you afraid I might shake his head?"

"Now that I've seen you I can't believe that the reason. I must have been out of consideration for your less fortunate sisters whose pale beauty is dimmed by your Egyptian princess brilliance."

There's no need for all that Egyptian hush in my case. I'd have known it for the truth no matter what I saw you, nor under what circumstances. He laughed with a little of understanding exultation in his voice. "But how you're going to make them all suffer now!"

It was a charming thing for a man to say, but Starr thought of the man to pass his life just a little too glibly. She shot him an amused glance from beneath her long, sleek lashes.

"I suppose that's your usual line for every new woman you meet?"

Make Good Mechanics

Exhumes Have Considerable Aptitude States Bishop of Arctic

Telling of an Eskimo convicted of murder and serving five years at the R.C.M.T. barracks, Akivik, who is "perfectly harmless," looks after the inspector's child when his wife is busy, and is declared by her to be the best nurse I could get anywhere. Rt. Rev. Dr. Archibald I. Fleming, Anglican bishop of the Arctic, related a number of incidents and observations of his recent tour of his huge diocese, one-third the entire land area of Canada.

The bishop, whose domain comprises 2,250,000 square miles, land and water, travelled 4,570 miles by air, 4,000 by railway and 900 by water, averaging 100 miles a day despite 16 days' delay at Herschel Island, and visited every mission except Bathurst Island and Cambridge, where the ice and snow were impossible to penetrate.

While Indians make better carpenters, the Eskimo have considerable mechanical aptitude, said the bishop, telling of losing the second-hand of a watch and having it replaced by Taylor Pokiak, an Eskimo at Tuktoyaktuk, after every time he had had to repair it had had to confess inability of having his camera repaired by John Kogak of Herschel Island. Another he travelled in a motor boat belonging to an Eskimo who, when a cylinder-head had cracked, had repaired it with a strip of canvas and some wire, "and it worked fine."

Natives are now being trained as carpenters, and the new school for 100 children at Akivik, now the largest building in the empire north of the Arctic Circle, has been built entirely by natives under a master carpenter, Thomas Sumner, of Ontario. The new school, which is 13 by 75 feet, has 12 teachers, and the principal is Rev. H. Sherman Shepherd, of Halifax.

The new hospital at Akivik, replacing the one burned down in April, is well equipped, the bishop said, and when completed will have 38 beds, so arranged that normally only 24 will be available, the other of being cut out to save fuel. Modern operating tables and equipment are being installed, and it is hoped that contributions will make possible up-to-date X-ray equipment by the opening.

It was a charming thing for a man to say, but Starr thought of the man to pass his life just a little too glibly.

She shot him an amused glance from beneath her long, sleek lashes.

Testing Crops for Quality

The world's vast burdensome surplus of wheat that has been depressing prices for the past few years is fast disappearing. Wheat prices in consequence have risen. To obtain the greatest benefit from higher prices farmers should produce a high quality crop. See the nearest Searle or Home Agent about having YOUR crop tested for quality.

SEARLE GRAIN COMPANY, LIMITED

Miss Gertrude Verschu was operated on for appendicitis in the St. Michael hospital, Lethbridge on Wednesday.

Summerlike weather has been experienced this week with the thermometer ranging between 80 and 90. A little frost at night maybe, but the days have been wonderful.

Manyberries Range Station Weekly Letter
Preservation of Fence Posts
Experiments conducted at this Station to determine the relative merits of treated fence posts as against untreated have shown some rather interesting results.
One experiment, started in 1927, compares posts which were treated with coal tar or creosote with untreated posts. In 1936 all of the untreated posts were either completely rotted off a few inches below the ground or showed such advanced stages of rot that they will have to be replaced within the next year. Quite a number had been replaced in 1935 and 1934. All of the treated posts were quite sound. A comparison between the two treatments, tarring and creosoting, failed to show any definite advantage in favour of one or the other at the end of the 9 year period. However, there is a decided advantage in the tarring treatment where cost and equipment is considered. Tarring cost from 11 to 2 cents per post, whereas creosoting cost from 5 to 6 cents per post, depending on the size of the post. Moreover, a creosoting apparatus is more elaborate in construction and a longer time is necessary in which to do the job thoroughly.

An experiment carried on at this Station compares other treatments with various kinds of wood. Pressure-treated (purchased commercially), bleached and charred posts are being tested along with and tarred and creosote dipped posts. Charring has no apparent effect on rotting at all of the charred posts were as badly rotted as the untreated. Pressure-treated pine posts show excellent durability but they entail a high initial cost for treating large areas. The bluestone treatment shows very good results especially with poplar posts. The cost of bluestone is usually less than 2¢ per post, the construction of the tank and method of treatment being quite simple. The next letter will describe the methods of treating posts which are carried out quite extensively at this Station.

There Are Differences

Is there any difference between Pool Elevators and line elevator companies? The latter seem anxious to prove that both are the same, but there are several essential differences.

1. Alberta Pool Elevators are the property of 15,000 Alberta grain producers. They are built for service and not for profit. This is not the case with line elevator companies.
2. The finances and operations of Pool elevators are an open book. Each year they are scrutinized by security delegates who are representatives of the producers. The detailed operations of the whole system and of each and every Pool elevator are thus obtainable from elected delegates. In these line elevator companies who will provide producers with such information?
3. The Pool men have the grain exchange, but this does not imply an ill-advised attitude towards that organization. The Pools believe that the demonstrative weakness of the speculative system during the depression has a close relation to the huge crop of speculators, and that a national wheat board would have proved greater protection. The line elevator companies are not in favour of a national wheat board and never were. John L. McFarland, who conducted stabilization of wheat prices for five years, testified: "Theoretically the open futures system is an ideal system for the handling of wheat, if it works but when it fails to function, as it has failed, because of world-wide speculation, over supply and under demand, to carry the hedges, then my sympathy lies entirely towards the producer and his protection."
4. The Pools believe the Canadian wheat producers should be given assistance and protection to as great a degree as least as other interests in Canada. The Pool maintains that agriculture is Canada's most important industry and cannot be neglected. The grain trade on the other hand, especially campaigned for marketing Canada's wheat at "world prices".
5. The grain trade says that the Pool's operations cost nothing. That is a pure fabrication. Under the McFarland stabilization operations Canadian farmers produced and marketed the surplus of wheat crops, crops totalling more than one billion bushels, and Canadian prices were maintained at a substantially higher level than those of competing countries. For months the Canadian producers ran as high as 25¢ a bushel over prices of competitive wheat.
6. The Pools believe that agriculture needs an aggressive co-operative organization supporting the interests and reflecting the expressed wishes of producers and not subservient to vested interests. The line elevator company, a R.R. vested interest.
7. The line elevator companies resort, being designated as a "family compact", but the very advertisement denying this relationship was a joint effort aimed to substantiate the statement.
